Introduction

Caregiving can be rewarding, but it can also cause stress and feelings of frustration. Caring for another who has recently become disabled, or has Alzheimer's disease, can change one's life. You may find yourself experiencing feelings of being overwhelmed, angry and resentful. During those times, there are several services available, to support you and your family. These services can also increase the independence of your loved one, creating community connections to make your support network even stronger.

This workshop will help you understand symptoms of stress related to caregiving, the types of support and resources available for caregivers, and how we can continue to care for ourselves as well.

Opening Discussion

*Do you find it difficult to care for others and yourself?
Do you talk openly with your family, about how you wish to be cared for?*

The Challenges of Caregiving

DISCUSSION:

Are there cultural expectations related to caregiving?

How has your culture informed care taking roles within your family?

The demands of caregiving can have long-term affects on your physical and mental health as well as relationships. Learning to recognize the signs of caregiver stress can assist you in getting help from support services. Some signs of stress, that are quite common for caregivers include:

- Mood swings
- Exhaustion
- Drinking heavily
- Depression
- Overeating or not eating enough
- Sleeping too much or too little
- Neglecting responsibilities
- New or worsening health problems
- Feelings of resentment
- Foggy thoughts, trouble concentrating

A caregiver with extreme stress can be detrimental to the person receiving care, as well as to the caregiver themselves.

Take the Quiz: Caregiver Stress

Place the number in the white box that applies to you.

Every day = 1 Often = 2 Sometimes=3 Seldom Never=4

How common is it for you to get seven or more hours of rest?

How often do you experience feelings of joy and happiness?

How often do you feel you have the energy for daily tasks?

How often do you engage in social activities, or do things you enjoy?

How often are you patient with the person you are caring for?

Results

Total=

Caregiver stress can be described in terms of a scale. If your answers resulted in high scores, 15-20 points, you may be experiencing high levels of caregiver stress. It is important that you and your family come up with a strategy to relieve caregiver stress. There are services to help and know that you are not alone.

Caring for Ourselves

DISCUSSION:

Would you access services for you and your loved one?

In order to keep loved ones safe and well taken care of, we must first address our own well-being. Here are a couple of things to keep in mind, when caring for loved ones.

- Make time for yourself~ Don't forget about self-care. Making time to do things that bring you happiness are important.
- Access the services available~ Sometimes we think we can accomplish everything on our own and that asking for help shows weakness. Accessing services available to you is your right and will increase your quality of life.
- Set realistic goals~ Setting small goals that are measurable and realistic will help keep you focused.
- Involve your loved one in their care~ Remember that they may find losing their independence and privacy, difficult. Respect their wishes about remaining independent in ways that are reasonable. For example, choosing what to wear or dressing themselves.
- Have a support system~ It is important to share your feeling with others especially those with shared experiences. Joining a support group might bring great comfort.

Smart Goals

Set Goals that are smart!

S Specific
M Measurable
A Attainable
R Reasonable, Rewarding
T Time-Based

Set goals related to your care that follows the 5 principals of a smart goal, for example:

I will call my friend at 1:00 pm for support once a day for a week.
